Traditionally, a coarse-mode, multi-output camcorder relies on a slow shutter to avoid a single bright spot on a video frame, such as that produced by fast-moving objects or a flash. If one or more motion-blurred objects are present on a scene when the shutter opens, the entire or the majority of the scene will be prone to artifacts. The conventional solution to this problem has been to drop the shutter speed and get really, really lucky. This increases the chance of getting noise but is unacceptable if someone is not already running. In a standard camcorder, if the shutter is exposed long enough to get a solid image with sharp objects at full frames per second, e.g. 120 fps, only a single frame will be available per second if the camera is shooting a full movie. In this case, if the camera is set to shoot 10 frames per second, it will capture 10 single photos (10 fps=1/fps), which is a very small number, even for video. Or an owner with a good memory might remember that they captured the start of the video at a single frame, thereby losing many video frames. Conventional solutions to the motion-blurred problem typically take advantage of an image-based anti-motion blurring technique, such as de-blurring. The de-blurring technique typically analyzes the image to find and remove the motion blur. The image-based anti-motion-blur techniques are typically implemented in a video codec. The de-blurring process can use temporal de-blurring to find and remove motion blur.
