At the time, the family was living in Cuba, where the former blind girl was studying at university. She realized that her son, Andrew, couldn't cope with exams or noise, and began to wonder if there was a better way to help him study. By then, the family had already decided that they would bring Andrew to the U.S. to receive treatment. "I had no idea that two years later I would be living in Cambridge with an oncologist," said Watt. A 16-year-old boy with a brain tumour has a unique chance at survival, thanks to a groundbreaking technique that uses a 3D printer to create a custom treatment mould, a procedure that costs less than $10,000. For the next six months, Andrew wore an implanted device, called the BrainLizer, which helped him to focus and learn. The device was connected to a computer that sends feedback to the software driving the 3D printer. "[I] knew from the first time I saw him in the hospital that this boy was going to need a lot of help in the months to come," said Kym Boyer, an associate director at Children's National who cared for Andrew. The machine was used for approximately three months. BrainLizers are now being used to help other children with brain tumours, including a 3-year-old who was recently treated at Children's National. "This is a landmark development in the field of drug delivery," said Peter Ehrlich, a professor at the University of British Columbia's Okanagan campus. They have potential for wider application, and can
